She cannot imagine her daughter smoking, but to meet a smoking girl, Livia had been downcast, it was here she went to college, she had already had one girl, five boys. She had hoped her last son would be tall, short and then grew to see her father's face.
Livia imagines Abby drinking a beer.
"It's that girl," Jeffrey says.
"Jenna?" Livia says.
"Livia met Jenna briefly after coming home from the month. She and Abby were in the living room watching TV. She seemed nice. A pretty girl, Jenna looks like a real teenager. Abby seems much younger." Livia quickly saves the draft of her email and goes to a decorating Web site. She can't concentrate on work with Jeffrey talking.
Livia sighs. "Are you going to say something?"
"Of course," he says. "Of course—Livia—don't you realize this is a problem! You really need to grow up here. Our daughter is drinking and smoking, for God's sake! What's wrong with you?" Jeffrey has not told her to grow up for ages. When they were younger he gave her the same line. He told her she was a spoiled brat and a child.
When Abby was first born, and Livia was overwhelmed and bored, he brought home books on mathering. She sometimes tried to look out the baby's crying but ended up falling asleep instead.
She had breastfed like they had decided. She had decorated Abby's baby room. She dressed Abby up
